Child Development and Journal of Research on Adolescence to Announce Special Sections on Racial Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion

Child Development and The Journal of Research on Adolescence are committed to highlighting innovative and high impact developmental scholarship that pertains to racial diversity, equity, and inclusion. The journals will jointly be announcing separate special sections relevant to these important and timely topics.

Child Development's Special Section will highlight research that investigates the roles of socialization, contexts, and policies in the development of anti-racism in youth, including scholarship that examines the development of anti-racist attitudes, ideological perspectives and behaviors within and across contexts with attention to developmental stage. The Journal of Research on Adolescence will publish a series of special issues/sections that emphasize the role of racism and systems of oppression that impact Black youth and other youth of color; examine how whiteness is learned and confronted; and investigate adolescents' resistance of racism and other forms of oppression.

Stay tuned for each journal's Call for Papers, which will formally announce this important work.
