

Interdisciplinary Committee

Mission Statement

The mission of the interdisciplinary committee is to enhance quality, promote visibility, and support capacity building related to interdisciplinary research in the developmental sciences. Through this, we aim to facilitate bold but thoughtful boundary crossings between disciplines to address scientific questions and identify multi-system factors that contribute to innovation and impact on child development. However, the diversity of theory, methods, and language across disciplines often results in a siloing of knowledge that impedes progress toward an integrated understanding of developmental phenomena. Our goal is to help build equitable interdisciplinary bridges that break down these silos, and to inspire as well as foster a culture that rewards the next generation of scientists to address complex human development questions with an interdisciplinary frame.

Recent Initiatives (2025):

Early Career Interdisciplinary Scholars Fellowship (ECISF) Program: Supports early-career scholars within five years of earning a terminal degree in a field outside psychology or human development who are conducting interdisciplinary work in developmental science.

Is Technology Good or Bad for Child Development – Webinar: This interdisciplinary webinar explores the evolving role of technology in child development, highlighting both its potential benefits and emerging concerns. Panelists share insights across fields and outline a forward-looking research agenda for the next decade.
