Welcome

Dear Attendees,

Welcome to DEVSEC! We are delighted that you will be joining us for what promises to be an outstanding special topic meeting in Phoenix. Every day, every moment, and in every environment we are collecting data on how individuals develop across the lifespan. There is a wealth of data for understanding development but only a small number of developmental scientists have taken advantage of these data to study human development from cells to the environment. Our goal in organizing this meeting was not only to create a venue for scientists to learn and share research using these resources, but also to provide training opportunities on using data archives and open source data that are well-suited for addressing questions of developmental scientists across multiple methods of data collection (survey, video, audio, neuroimaging, genomics, evaluation, administrative), disciplines (psychology, sociology, economics, demography, pediatrics, public health, anthropology, education), and cultures.

To accomplish this goal, we have an outstanding lineup of keynote and symposium speakers. We also are introducing novel presentation formats, including “Methods Morning” on Thursday with a Data Set Blitz and analysis workshops, and an Interactive Poster Session Friday night. Through these sessions, this meeting will highlight research using secondary sources of data and provide a unique opportunity for attendees to address their own developmental questions by being connected to a data resource for answering that question. Please browse the program and create an itinerary to maximize your learning opportunities at the meeting.

Thank you for contributing to this program and conversation. We are excited to learn and connect with you in Phoenix!

Chair: Pamela Davis-Kean
Speaker: Brian Nosek

Integrative Statement: Shifting the scholarly culture toward open data and open workflow is partly an incentives problem, partly an infrastructure problem, and partly a coordination problem. The Center for Open Science (COS; <http://cos.io/>) is a non-profit technology and culture change organization working to solve this. The central components of COS's strategy are providing free, open, public goods infrastructure that scholarly communities brand and operate based on their local norms (OSF; <http://osf.io/>), and coordinating across disciplinary and stakeholder silos to align scholarly practices with scholarly values. Greater openness of data, materials, and process will accelerate discovery and improve trust and credibility in the outputs of research.

Patrick Quinn, Martin Rickert, Johan Franck, Paul Lichtenstein, Henrik Larsson, Brian D'Onofrio

Integrative Statement: This international, interdisciplinary symposium features three presentations that employ administrative data to evaluate and inform public policy as well as illuminate health and well-being at different points of the lifespan. The symposium will begin with a presentation by the symposium's invited speaker, Elizabeth Gershoff, who will discuss and highlight the use of secondary and administrative data to address policy-relevant developmental questions. The symposium will then proceed with two additional presentations that cleverly and aptly utilize administrative data to either evaluate or inform public policy. Specifically, the symposium's second presentation uses statewide administrative records from North Carolina to assess the impact of SNAP (formerly known as food stamps) receipt as well as the timing of SNAP receipt on adolescent school test scores. The symposium's third presentation uses merged Swedish nation-wide population registers to determine the predictors of opioid-prescription receipt among adolescents and young adults. The merits, opportunities, and challenges associated with the use of administrative data will be discussed and highlighted.

Integrative Statement: Dr. Rick Gilmore will lead a symposium on the value of an open science approach to developmental research. Drawing from the movement in psychological science more broadly, he will discuss the current state of available tools for facilitating transparent and reproducible work in developmental science and highlight opportunities and a vision for the future. Next, two research teams will share research that actualizes the promise of an open science approach to developmental science. Rebecca Beights and colleagues utilize data from the open Autism Brain Imaging Data Exchange (ABIDE) II initiative to examine the link between structural brain volume and working memory in children and adolescents with and without autism spectrum disorder. Dr. Melissa Kline with colleagues from the ManyBabies Consortium present data from a replication of infant directed speech experiments across over 60 labs, aiming to get an accurate estimate of effects and to examine how testing practices influence results.

Have you ever considered using secondary or open source data before? If so, this session is for you! It is comprised of individually submitted posters that address the following: What is the research question you wish to answer? How is your ability to answer this research question limited by the data resources currently available to you? How would you like to use secondary data or open source data in your research specifically? Experts at the meeting will provide feedback and guidance, with an aim of identifying secondary or open source data that could be used to address your research question.

Please join us for a lively discussion which will be accompanied by hors d'oeuvres and a cash bar.

Integrative Statement: The Adolescent Brain Cognitive Development (ABCD) Study is a large-scale, multi-site study of health and behavior focusing on the developing brain, and on factors that influence adolescent trajectories of cognitive, intellectual, and social-emotional development. The goal is to enroll well over 10,000 children at 9 or 10 years of age, at 21 sites nationwide, and follow them for 10 years. The ABCD consortium has embraced an open-science model and an aggressive timeline for sharing, not only the terabytes of data collected, but the computational workflows used to produce them, and some novel computational tools that the scientific community can use to explore and model them. Three members of the ABCD team will provide additional information about the ABCD Resource: Terry Jernigan, Co-Director of the Coordinating Center, will give an overview of the ABCD study, the cohort and data collected, and the data sharing policies and timelines; Hugh Garavan, Associate Director of the Coordinating Center and U. Vermont site PI, will describe in more detail the functional imaging data and some early results emerging from the study; and Wesley Thompson, Associate Director for Biostatistics (of the ABCD Data Analysis and Informatics Center) will describe a powerful new tool under development in ABCD to help users to optimize their analyses of ABCD data.

3-008. How Data Sharing Succeeded in Neuroimaging
Chair: Pamela Davis-Kean
Speaker: Russell A. Poldrack

Integrative Statement: The sharing of data has become a central goal in many areas of science, but some areas have been more successful than others. I will discuss the collective journey towards open data sharing that has happened in the neuroimaging community over the last two decades, which has now led to fairly widespread sharing and re-use of imaging datasets. I will focus on two sets of factors that have been central to this journey: incentives to share data, and infrastructure to facilitate data sharing.
